

When solving a rational equation, why is it necessary to perform a check?

It is necessary to perform a check because some solutions may cause a denominator in the equation to have a value of zero. This is not allowed because dividing by zero is not defined. Solutions which cause a denominator to equal zero must be discarded. Performing a check of the solutions obtained will identify any that are invalid.